FIJI.

The following communication from Fiji will be found of great interest. The writer is a gentleman of long experience in Fijiian affairs, and of unquestionable ability. It will be seen that the native chieftains and white settlers of the Windward Islands have made greater progress towards the establishment of governmental institutions suited to the changed and changing circumstances of the Fijian Archipelago than the people of Ovalau, and of other places under the rule of Thakombau, have as yet been able to do.
At the same time, it cannot be denied that there are still some features of the present state of things in the "Lau" territory which look not quite so promising. The grant by Maafu to a committee of white men of a power to veto such of the laws as may not seem applicable to the interests of their race seems to be but a clumsy and ill-considered effort, of which many difficulties and anomalies fatal to good government are not unlikely to grow. We should have imagined that with the aid of councilors chosen from among the settlers—many of whom are thoroughly competent to advise in such matters—some definite code might have been drawn up, and a mixed administration established (under native sovereignty) capable of guarding the interests of both races, without the creation of such an Imperium in Imperio as this vetoing committee of foreign residents. We fear that the action of such a body may be found so obstructive to the views of the native rulers and people as to induce a revocation of the charter, and to renew old disorders.These fears may not, however, be realised, and there is still hope of a well-ordered and efficient government in the "Lau" dominions. In an age when so much has been gained, and there are already far better hopes for the future of this part of Fiji. The establishment of a good and strong Government will be all the more likely if the white settlers lead their earnest efforts towards the maintenance of native rights and the granting of civilised laws and usages on the Fijian system, instead of labouring, as they seem inclined to do, with the avowed object of establishing their own (the settlers') supremacy, and reducing the native chiefs and people to a position of legal inferiority. If such a design is pursued the natives will soon be fully alive to it, and collision will be certain, at some time or other, to take place. Those who are well informed on Fijian affairs will see but the force of what is urged in the following communication as to the almost certain confusion in the dominions on the death of Thakombau, and of the probability of Maafu obtaining still more power and influence in the archipelago, than he has already achieved.
There are, however, many obstacles in his way.
His Tonga origin, for instance, is scarcely a recommendation to general rule in Fiji, nor is the "land policy" which he is likely to adopt (and, if we mistake not, has already avowed) of a kind to make the white settlers of Viti Levu and its vicinity anxious that he should "reign over them." The policy of absolutely forbidding all sales of land, in fee simple to foreigners, and compelling the latter to be content with leases, is all the more difficult to realize, however, because it will be easily met by the force of native custom and law. The chiefs and people will be told before the time comes that they have no right to sell their land, and that they must not expect much from a race just emerging of cannibalism. Nor must we attempt to effect great changes suddenly. We must respect the prejudices of a grossly ignorant people, and deal with them in patience, being as far as possible removed from the scenes of the meeting. Maafu and the Lau Chieftains are most anxious that we should assume our share of the responsibilities and care of Government, and, if we but act with moderation and forbearance, we shall be permitted, practically, to do what we desire to do. It is to be hoped that we may not expect much from a race just emerging of cannibalism. Nor must we attempt to effect great
